Seasons Greetings,

It was just a few words within a few interactions, but I saw it. I saw the change, the change that happens when a relationship with a student goes from withdrawn to just a little more. It was the most hopeful moment I had at our Ugly Sweater Party.

For the last five months, I noticed this student and her friends. Out of the five, I had the sense that this is the one who I might actually be able to connect with. She is quiet and follows her friend's lead, though, so I knew a connection wouldn't happen by itself. So, every time they showed up I decided I would seek them out, greet them like a friend, ask how they are, and fight to get them involved in activities.

Honestly, most weeks all I would get is a smirk or a single smile if she was having fun, and all I could do was pray God would be active in those moments. However, on December 18th, God continued to prove He is who He says He is.

That night, this student came to our Ugly Sweater Party, we had fun, we had awesome cocoa, and we chatted several times. Now, that may sound insignificant, but it wasn't just "how is the weather" chatting, but the excited chatting you have with someone when you are comfortable and having fun. This was the first time this student interacted with myself or volunteers in such a way. It was a sign, a sign that the connection had just gotten stronger. Maybe only one step stronger, but that is still progress.

This is only one example of many students we see who are afraid to be real with others, who have learned to distrust adults, who don't know what it's like to be in authentic relationships. It may take weeks, months, or even years to see much or any progress at all, but every moment is worth it. So, we fight for those moments, the moments which give us a chance to move the relationship even one step forward.

Our fight is long and challenging, but we press on to win the race set before us, for we have One who has ran before us and showed us how to run. May God guide us on our race, and may He use it to bring our students into the race as well.

Grace and Peace,

Zach Lewis
